The Norwegian king, mounted on a black charger, with a white star in its forehead, rode round the circle encouraging his men, and was rendered conspicuous by his dazzling helmet, and the sky blue mantle he wore above his coat of mail, which reached half way down the leg, and was called Emma, probably after the name of some favourite lady. Harold of England, notwithstanding all the advantages of his enemys position, resolved to attack them, and at daybreak on the 25th of September commenced hostilities with the view of forcing the passage of the river, a detachment on the western side, placed to guard the bridge, appears to have been quickly routed and driven in upon the main body. Then it was, while the English were pursuing the fugitives, and attempting to cross the river, that the...
