There was a strict geographical (England and its colonies) and also social (high, middle and lower class) order in Victorian England. Englishmen and Christianity were regarded superior to the subject races and their religions (e.g. Islam or Buddhism), those were considered barbaric and their beliefs archaic and of low moral. Most of Collins' contemporaries believed in the necessity and generosity of imperialism. Nayder even claims that racial hatred towards the subject races was the general, public opinion of the masses in England, especially after the Mutiny in 1857 which motivated Charles Dickens to state: 'I wish I were Commander in Chief in India. The first thing I would do to strike that Oriental race with amazement . should be to proclaim to them, in their language, that I consider my holding that appointment by the leave of God, to mean that I should do my utmost to exterminate the Race upon whom the stain of the late cruelties lasted' (Nayder, pp. 216/217). Collins distances himself from the public opinion of the time and regards the oriental literature which teaches Muslim and Buddhist morals as equal to Christian moralistic teaching. This becomes clear when we take a look at his 'A Sermon for Sepoys' from 1858, where he almost praises the oriental ideals of devotion to the service of god, unimportance of earthly properties and brotherly love, which will lead to an eternal life in paradise....
