Charles Clifford did not return at the end of a fortnight, as he had purposed, nor for many days after. On the eve of her concert, Mrs. Freeman received a letter from him, written in evident grief and anxiety, saying that by his fathers desire he had applied for an extension of leave, in consequence of the very critical state of his brothers health. John, he wrote, had been ailing ever since winter had set in, but the immediate cause of alarm was an attack of pleurisy and congestion of one lung, which had declared itself about a week after Charlies arrival. The worst was now, they hoped, over, and though his prostration was alarming, the doctors were more encouraging, but all now depended on averting a relapse, and a hard frost having set in, kept them still in much anxiety. The minuteness...
